Companies Fined Under PDPA

Several companies here have been fined as much as $50,000 for violating the Personal Data Protection Act (PDPA).

The breach was the failure to provide adequate security for protection of customer data, not having a data protection officer and data protection policies.

This first time enforcement by the Personal Data Protection Commission has strong implications for companies and their HR departments concerning the measures they undertake to protect their customer and employee data against unauthorised access and exposure.

PDPA for HR Professionals - 11 May - 2nd Run

As HR practitioners often handle and come across employees and job candidates' personal data, it is critical they understand how the PDPA can affect their work and policies. Thus, HR practitioners need to review and re-evaluate existing HR policies and processes in order to align with the Act...more
